INTRODUCTION

"Who shall write the history of the American Revolution?" John Adams lamented early in the 1800's. "Who will ever be able to write it?" The most essential documents were all in secret...and are now lost forever." This, unfortunately, has largely been true for the study of this crucial period in America's history. Historians and scholars have labored mightily to fill this void in documentary records by unearthing many auxiliary recollections and military registers to use in their basic research. While not providing a complete reconstruction of all the events of the Revolution, these original sources have served as a fertile field for much lively interpretation of the many stresses and strains that led to the formation of the nation.

Although Adams could not have known it, at least these ancillary materials have fortunately been preserved for the use of all. The occasion of the Bicentennial celebration of the Revolutionary era has led to a flurry of activity on the part of scholars and publishers, with commemorative and interpretative materials being issued in a veritable barrage of words, sounds, and pictures. Libraries have been able to participate in this celebration by enriching their Americana collections and assembling timely materials for exhibit. They have, in fact, become leading centers for the Bicentennial observances in the nation, states, and local communities.

The Sarah Byrd Askew Library and the William Paterson College A-V Center have become a leading center for the Bicentennial with a collection of more than 850 titles of book and non-book materials. This bibliography represents an attempt at a comprehensive listing of the materials presently owned by these facilities. The entire period, as well as studies of limited topics such as the activity in individual colonies, military campaigns, diplomacy and revolutionary finance, are included.

The bibliography is arranged by topic and subarranged by author. Where necessary the items are annotated for clarification and usefulness. The classification and location numbers have been given and special subject headings indicated. An index of main entry authors and titles has been included.

It is hoped that this work will make the riches of this collection accessible to students, researchers, and the general public for their own personal celebration of the Bicentennial of the American Revolution.
